How, why, and where of thermal maturation
Comparison of thermal gradients in the Appalachian Basin from high-resolution equilibrium temperature and depth logs with estimated thermal gradients from bottomhole temperature corrections, suggests that bottom-hole temperature correction methods accurately estimate thermal gradients. .................. 2155

An important source rock
Natural gas associated with condensate in the Baiyun depression and the Panyu lower uplift is primarily generated from type II kerogen while the heavy hydrocarbon gases (propane, butanes and pentanes) are derived from type III kerogen from the Wenchang and Enping Formations. ......................... 2171

Improving general exploration workflows
Outcrop and subsurface interpretations of facies, faults, depocenters, and paleocurrents are used to construct a three-dimensional geocellular facies model of the Middle Magdalena Valley basin, Columbia, to detect new areas of potential interest associated with stratigraphic or combined stratigraphic-structural traps. ......................... 2201

Shale gas potential
Even though the shales in Sanquan Town, Nanchuan District, Chongqing, China, have considerable shale gas potential, the shale gas potential is most likely poor because the escape of shale gas is accelerated by the detachment layer in destroyed anticlines and synclines. ......................... 2239

A proposed workflow
The authors propose a workflow to aid in carbonate reservoir characterization, Pampo field, Campos Basin, offshore Brazil, using acoustic seismic inversion, cosimulation geostatistical techniques for porosity, and facies modeling. An area for possible exploration was identified. ......................... 2267

Stress distribution and coalbed methane
Magnitude of horizontal maximum, horizontal minimum, and vertical stress increases with depth up to 600 m (1969 ft). Intermediate stresses followed multiple relationships, while in layers deeper than 800 m (2624 ft), a dominant normal faulting stress regime was evident. ......................... 2283

Anomalous conductivity
Shale samples from the Marcellus Shale, Pennsylvania, have low electrical resistivity due to an interconnected network of high-conductivity organic matter. The high electrical conductivity results from partial graphitization of the migrated pyrobitumen. ................................. 2305

Effectively using horizontal well data
Because horizontal wells are designed to drill into a specific zone, formation surfaces have a much more complex spatial location relationships with horizontal wellbores than with vertical wellbores. Specific methods to deal with these issues are discussed in this paper. ......................... 2333

A prototype workflow
The authors present a prototype workflow for automated fracture detection along horizontal scanlines using terrestrial laser scanning. The data is integrated into conventional reservoir modeling software to characterize natural fracture networks with regard to orientation and spatial distribution. .... 2355

Understanding lacustrine shallow-water delta systems
The purpose of this study is to analyze the characteristics of the lacustrine shallow-water delta system of the Dongying Formation, Bohai Basin, eastern China, and to summarize the controlling factors of shallow-water delta development. ................................. 2389
