Marcellus Shale gas wells produce large volumes of brine. Samples of this water from the Appalachian basin, Pennsylvania were taken to determine whether the water originated from the Marcellus itself or from adjacent reservoirs via fractures. .......................................................... 181

Groundwater is an important influence in the preservation of coalbed methane in the Ordos basin, China. This water has common chemical characteristics and is an important exploration tool because of its relation to coal depositional environment and hydrodynamic maturation of groundwater................................................................. 207

Understanding thermal maturity patterns and hydrocarbon fluid-type distributions within the Kurdistan Region of Iraq will help to guide risk assessment for remaining prospectivity and future exploration drilling. ................................................. 231

Wells in the Mackenzie Delta had been drilled on structural highs. A comment in an old drilling report led to the testing of an alternate hypothesis, and the Umiak field was discovered. Post-well appraisals of dry holes can initiate new thought processes that lead to exploration success. ......................................................................................................... 273

Two-dimensional views of three-dimensional allochthonous salt bodies and associated stratal geometries of the northern Flinders Ranges and eastern Willouran Ranges, South Australia, yield important insights into the initiation, breakout, and advance of allochthonous salt............................................. 293

The purpose of this study is to investigate the variation in log resistivity based on petrography, mineralogy, and organic matter property and porosity. Log resistivity is associated with oil generation during organic matter maturation and is not controlled by mineralogy or porosity. ................................. 333
